Recent advances in the technique of microarray-based hybridization enable rapid analysis of complex mixtures for the presence of harmful chemicals. The present study shows how this technique can be used to screen for chemicals that are present at low levels in a complex mixture. The method of hybridization used to detect the presence of chemicals in a mixture is not significantly affected by the complexity of the mixture. By using a microarray platform for toxicological testing, the analysis of mixtures can be substantially reduced from the time and cost of using traditional techniques. Specific chemicals can be identified from mixed samples by using the unique response patterns of each chemical. The reproducibility of the testing is also substantially improved, and it is possible to run multiple tests in a single microarray. This cost-effective and streamlined testing procedure was validated by testing 157 whole-cell microarray slides for the presence of chemicals that are known to be present at low levels in the effluent from conventional wastewater treatment processes. The power of the methodology was demonstrated by correctly predicting whether or not known chemicals were present in the effluent based on the unique response patterns of each chemical in the hybridization. In addition, the predictive capability of the microarrays was validated by predicting the presence of toxic chemicals from response patterns that had been previously verified using a conventional testing

Kynurenine is a tryptophan metabolite that may modulate immune responses through neuroactive and other physiologic actions. Expression of IDO can be induced by interferon gamma (IFN $\gamma$ ) and may contribute to the antitumor effects of interferon gamma in cells of the immune system. Recent reports show that IFN $\gamma$  can induce apoptosis in murine B16 melanoma cells that express IDO. We used a murine cell line (APC.i/c) derived from a colon carcinoma to study the role of endogenous IDO in apoptosis induced by IFN $\gamma$ . We found that IFN $\gamma$  induced apoptosis in APC.i/c cells, an effect that was augmented in the presence of kynurenine. Additionally, we tested the effect of kynurenine on the growth of established murine colon carcinomas in vivo and found that kynurenine treatment (50 and 100 mg/kg/day for 4 weeks) significantly inhibited tumor growth. The proliferation of normal murine colon mucosa was not affected by treatment with kynurenine. These studies show that exogenous kynurenine can induce apopt 1cdb36666d

English and Spanish are two of the most commonly spoken languages in the world. But when students study either of these two languages, they don't always get as much attention as the languages that are used less frequently. Take Spanish for example. Americans may learn a few words and phrases in Spanish, but students study and practice Spanish far less than they do a language that is arguably more common, like English, according to the Office of English Language Acquisition. "Words like 'cheerio,' 'hello,' and 'goodbye' aren't taught in many schools," says Jennifer Lynch, Ed.D., associate professor of education at East Carolina University. It's important for kids to learn at least two languages in school, according to Lynch. "Both English and Spanish are important languages to learn, but Spanish is the fastest growing language in the world," she says. "It's important for kids to learn at least two languages in school.
